The engineers spent twelve hours in repairs, but when completed the ship could go only shout four miles an hour. She plinged and toesed, and the greatest consternation prevailed among the paspengers, many of whom lighted candles and practised weird incantations to appease the wrath of the sea.

Owing to the slownees with which the ship proceeded, the coal supply soon became short, and the food supply was in danger of being exhausted.

Part of the cargo was used for fuel, and when this was exhausted the minor deck fittings were torn away and fed to the furnace. Capt Kirschikedt and his crew did all possible to pacify the frightened passengers, most of whom were from Russia, but pandemonlum reigned during the remainder of the woyage, aspecially whenthe limited rations and water were daily given out.
